PREFACE.

HEN his Prussian Majesty thought fit, in a Time of full Peace, to invade the Dominions of the Queen of Hungary and Bohemia, and thereby rekindle the War in Germany, which was otherwise on the point of being extinguished; a Paper was published here under the Title of, An Exposition of his Motives, to which the first Part of the following Work was written in Answer, and had very probably on the A 2 Turn

3,03 118

Turn of Affairs that has followed fince, have been buried in Oblivion, had it not plainly appeared that some of the Notions insisted upon in that Foreign Performance, were really considered as Articles of their Political Faith, by some of our greatest Politicians at Home. It was this that induced the Author to finish it, and consent that it should be made Publick, as a full Answer to those new Doctrines, that to please the Patrons of them are now preached up, as sound Policy in a certain Chapel.

The Humour of abusing such, as are intrusted with the Management of Publick Affairs is, generally speaking, so strong in this Country, that it is a very difficult Matter in less than sifty or sixty Years after a Man is out of Power, to persuade the People that ever he deserved to be in; more especially if from the Consciousness Consciousness of his own Integrity, he never practifed the usual Arts of Ministers, never courted the Populace at the Expence of his Understanding and Dignity, or endeavoured to acquire an Interest elsewhere, but by deserving it. All Ministers are fure to be ill-treated, but that Minister most who least deserves it, because when he leaves his Post, he leaves no Party to cry him up, or to defend his Conduct. He who has been anxious only for the Service of his Country, is careless in this Refpect, or rather fearless, for he knows, that however Self-interested Men may abuse, they can never hurt him. He is fenfible that Time and Truth are Witnesses, that sooner or later acquit the Innocent; but though this may be sufficient for such a Minister, yet there is something more required for the Information of the People, 'and that for the People's fake.

To afford this Information, the following Sheets have been drawn from the Corner of a Closet into Daylight; and that the Defign of them may not be mistaken or misrepresented, let it be remembered that they are calculated for the full Proof of the following Propositions. I.
That the present is a National and not a Party-War; a War recommended to the Throne by the Voice of the People, and which therefore no Nation that would be thought wife, or wishes to continue free, would charge as a Crime upon a Minister, when in Truth it is a Meafure in which they may and ought to glory themselves, as it is strictly fpeaking their own.

II. That this War was not the Effect of hafty Refentment, but begun upon mature Deliberation and upon just Motives, of which the Nation

Nation was the more easily and fully convinced, because those Motives were National; that is to say, were such as redounded to the Interest and Honour, to the Sasety and Glory of the Nation. A War thus begun, ought undoubtedly to be prosecuted with the same Spirit and Zeal, and upon the same Motives upon which it was begun, since to vary or depart from these, would be to consess an Unsteadiness or Pusilanimity, unworthy of a brave and free People.

III. That all Pretences of profecuting the War on a new Defign, and for better Purpofes, are very dangerous and ought to be suspected, inasmuch as such Pretences are evidently calculated to deceive the People to betray the common Cause, and to introduce a new System not sit to be openly avowed, because it never can upon Just and National Principles be defended. It is for this

(viii)

this Reason, for I defy any Man living to affign another, that our present, upright, wife and able Ministers, have in the most solemn Manner, and in the most express Terms, declared by Memorials prefented at feveral Courts, that no Alteration of Men will be attended here with a Change of Measures; which is so clear, so full, and so unanswerable an Approbation of the Principles laid down and supported in the following Sheets, that there feems to be no Reason to apprehend their being ill received by any Party.

CERTAIN MINISTER.

S I R,

Cannot think that you will be displeased with the Liberty I take of addressing to you this Discourse on the present State of the Affairs of Europe, when I reflect on the many Liberties that have been taken, not with the Ministry only, but with the Crown of Great-Britain, by Papers and Pamphlets published abroad and at home too of late; as if fome imperceptible Change had happened in our Constitution, and foreign Princes and States had acquired a Right to appeal from the Judgment of a King of Great-Britain, to that of the British Nation. It is highly requifite, Sir, that a Point of this Importance should be set in a clear Light. The Zeal express'd in a late Rescript, and in the Paper Paper annexed thereto, with regard to the German Constitution, must ferve for my Apology, if any Warmth should escape me in Defence of our own.

The fudden Turn taken by his Prussian Majefty, did, indeed, give fuch an Alarm to all Europe in general, and to this Nation in particular, that there is no reason to wonder it should be thought expedient to foften the first Emotions of Men's Minds by as plaufible a Method as could be contrived; and, perhaps, in the Exposition of his Majesty's Motives for taking that extraordinary Step, this was pretty well done. But fure it was through an excess of Caution that these Motives were ushered into the World by another Piece, which in its Title is directed to a publick Minister, and, in the Body of it, to the People of Britain. I fay this was done through an excess of Caution, first, because the thing was plainly unnecessary; for if the Exposition of his Prussian Majesty's Motives was sufficient to fhew that they were just and unexceptionable, there was no need of this additional Lecture to the People of Britain: And, on the other hand, if any Doubt was entertained as to the Effects of that Exposition, the very Rescript itself carries in it a Contradiction, which shews how much Men are embarraffed when they do unwarrantable things.

For, mark me, Sir, this Rescript in the Original, (for as to the Translation it is never English, and very feldom Sense) makes his Prussian Majesty argue thus, "As no Prince in Ger-

" as little with the domestick Affairs of the " Empire, nor will oppose the Efforts that I, " in Conjunction with other well-meaning Powers " in the Empire, am refolv'd to employ, for pre-" ferving and maintaining the Dignity of our " Head, the Respect due to the Laws and Consti-" tution of our Country, and the Rights and Pre-" rogatives of its Members." Now, Sir, I befeech you to confider how the Principle kild down in the first Line I have quoted agrees with this Refcript. If in his Pruffian Majesty's Judgment no German Prince whatever has a Right to intermeddle with the interior Policy of Britain, what Right had his Minister to publish this Appeal to the People? Is not this intermeddling with the interior Measures of Great-Britain? Is it not questioning, I was going to fay, overturning our Constitution? Is it not exciting the People against their Prince? Surely you must confess it is, when you consider the Lines that immediately follow. " I the rather flatter myfelf, " continues the King, that England will not in-" terfere, because she has no Reason to meddle " in this Quarrel, either from the Considera-"TION OF HER COMMERCE, or otherwise; and " tho' fhe may have a greater Biass towards one " Court in Germany than another, I think her too " reasonable to pretend that Princes so powerful " and fo worthy of Respect as those of the " Empire are, should be obliged to conduct " themselves according to the Inclinations of "those of the English Nation, who are for " forcing their Countrymen to enter into foreign " Quarrels that regard not Great-Britain either " in black or white." As to the peculiar Beauty of the last Phrase, I confess it is lost with me; but so it stands in the Original, and the B 2

whole Force of the Argument amounts to this, that great things are hoped from the English Nation's discovering a Sense of foreign Affairs directly opposite to those of the King and his Ministers as advised by Parliament. It is a very unlucky Confequence of our most unhappy Divisions, that Foreigners, by attending to our Party Disputes, are misled into wrong Notions about our Constitution. They hear us talk of the People of Britain and of the British Nation, by which we certainly mean no more than in a legal Sense, the Choice of the People in their Reprefentatives, and the Sense of their Representatives expressed in Parliament; whereas they apprehend we mean the collective Body of the Nation, the Voice of the Crowd, and the Opinion of all who think fit to speak of publick Affairs. in Great-Britain know that there is a wide Difference between the Republick of Poland and the British People. We know that our Government is a Monarchy, that the Administration of the Government is vested in the King and the Legislature too, in Conjunction with the Lords and We know that the British Nation, in any other than this legal Sense, is a vague Expression, frequent indeed in the Mouths of Parties who love to fpeak much when they mean nothing; but furely the Wretch does not breathe in Britain, who dares to wish that the Sense of the British Nation should ever be fet up in Contradistinction to the Sense of the King and Parliament, and whoever shall attempt to introduce, or give Colour to fuch a Distinction, will certainly intermeddle with the Constitution to his Cost, and be foon taught to know that this Kingdom is not governed by the floating Opinions of the Many; but by fettled Laws, which were the Rules

Rules that governed our Ancestors, and by Obedience to which, we and our Posterity are to be made happy.

I thought my felf obliged, Sir, to speak thus plainly, that you might really know the Sense of every rational Man in England on this Subject; for I dare affure you, that none who have read that Rescript approve at all of this manner of proceeding. They very well know, and would be ready to avow it, that they expect Ministers should be accountable to the People, even for Measures directed by their Master; but when they fay this, they know their own Meaning; they know that this Account is to be given to those with whom the Power of the People is lodged, and this in Confequence of a legal Procedure. It is also true that in some Sense a Parliament may be faid to be accountable to the People, because on a Diffolution they are free to regulate their Choice according to the Senfe they have of their Representatives Conduct. But it is very clear that this Rescript is an Appeal to the Nation under none of these Restrictions. It appears from the Paragraph last quoted, that this is an Appeal to one Part of the Nation against the other. And what is this other? Why, those who are biaffed more in favour of one German Court than another: That is, in plain English, the House of Commons, who have so often addressed the King to support the House of Austria, and who have given fuch large Sums to his Majesty to enable him to comply with their Requests.

This is the fair and true State of the matter, and indeed it is of such high Consequence to us, that it ought to be fairly stated. As to the Infinuation that the Quarrels in Germany have nothing to do with our Commerce, there is fomething in it extremely injurious to the Nation. That we receive great Benefits from Trade, that Trade is a National Concern, and that we ought to refent any Attempt made to leffen or to injure it, are Truths well known and out of dispute, yet fure the British People are not to be treated like a Company of Merchants, or rather Pedlars, who, if they are permitted to fell their Goods, are to think themselves well off, whatever Treatment they may receive in any other respect. No furely, the British Nation has other great Concerns besides their Trade, and as she will never facrifice it, fo she will never endure any Insult in respect to them, without resenting it as becomes a People jealous of their Honour, and punctual in the Performance of their Engagements.

It has, indeed, been the Artifice of France to represent the Maritime Powers in this Light to all the World, and to each other. In the Language of that haughty Court, France, like old Rome, is to be the Mistress of the World, and the English and Dutch are to think themselves happy if the does not diffurb their Markets, but lets them enjoy the Fruits of their Industry. while they truckle to her Power, and are subservient to her Schemes. Let any Man but read the Letters and Negotiations of Van Hoey, and he will be fatisfied as to the Truth of this. will fee that the French Ministers treat him, as if instead of being an Ambassador from a great and powerful State, he was a Factor for a Company of Merchants, who had no Subfiftance but their Trade, and were obliged to mind that at the Expence of every thing elfe. Upon this Principle all their Reasonings turn; they tell him that that in case of a joint War with France, England may beat Holland out of a Part of her Trade; but if Holland will keep out of the Scrape, she may have all the Trade to herfelf. He may fee that when Mr. Van Hoey represented this Sort of Stuff to his Masters the States General, it was understood and treated by them with the Contempt it deserved; they resented, as became them, the Indignity of fuch a Treatment; and shewed that they had a Spirit worthy the Sovereigns of a free Republick, supported indeed by Trade; but at the same Time possessed of a Power capable of defending the Rights of their Subjects, and of affifting those Allies, by whose Aid in other critical Conjunctures, they had been fupported themselves, when not their Commerce only, but their very Being was in danger from the Ambition of this arrogant Power, that now talks and teaches other People to talk, as if the Maritime Powers had nothing to mind but their Trade, and their Subjects had a Right to call the Government to account, if they did not co 1fine their Care folely to this Subject. But, alas! how widely are they mistaken! who takes a larger Share in the War than our Merchants, and what greater Benefit can refult to our Commerce, than by rendering that Authority respected abroad to which it owes its Protection at home?

This odd Interjection of Commerce in this Place, plainly shews the Design for which this Piece was calculated, which must be to move the meanest and the lowest of the People, with whom Sound prevails more than Sense, and who affect to be ever anxious about Trade, how little soever it may concern them. As for those who are really engaged in foreign Trade, they are not to be imposed upon by fuch Pretences; they are convinc'd that the Safety of Commerce depends upon the Figure this Crown makes in Comparison with the other Powers of Europe; and a very laudable Proof they gave of their having this just Notion of things, by the Pains they took to drive the late Ministry into a War with Spain, and where there is the fame Reason, the Conclusion ought to be the same likewise. the Safety of Trade depends upon the Figure and Credit of the Nation, then whatever Attacks the latter, tends to the Prejudice of the former; but if the House of Austria is overborne, great Rival in Power and in Trade, by which I mean France, must carry all before her, and therefore whatever contributes to the preventing this, contributes fo far to the Security of our Trade; and this, I think, is a fuller Answer than was even necessary to so foolish an Objection.

I must, however, admit that there is some Poundation for what is suggested in the Memorial, as to the Biass of the British Nation in favour of the House of Austria; for surely if ever there was the Opinion of a whole Nation given on fuch a Point, every Part of the Nation has, at feveral Times, declared itself fully upon this Subject. The late Ministry always declared it to be their Intention to affift the House of Austria, and often complained of their Want of Power to fecond that Inclination. These Declarations, however did not screen them from the Refentments of those who thought there was not fo much done for the Support of the Queen of Hungary as her Circumftances, and the Interests of Great-Britain required, and every Body knows that that it was chiefly by the pressing this Tropick that Ministry was overturned.

All who were then in the Opposition were unanimous in their Sentiments that our whole Force ought to be exerted, not only in purfuance of Treaties, but in pursuance of the Publick Welfare; and it is fresh in every Man's Memory, that the first Step taken upon the Change was to fend the Earl of Stair abroad with Instructions to inform the Dutch, that we were determined to fuccour that Princess effectually, and expected therefore the fame from them. I have been now a close Observer of publick Affairs for upwards of twenty Years, and I do not remember any Measure received with greater, or even with fo great Applause as this. It may be objected, and I believe with Truth, that fome People have argued in publick Assemblies, as if they had fince changed their Minds; but this Objection does by no means reach the present Ministry, they have steadily pursued in Power the Plan they recommended when out, and in this they have shewn themselves to be steady and able Men; and as for those who have changed, their Motive is very plain, fince without oppofing this Measure, they could not oppose at all, and by opposing they have plainly lost their Credit with the People, as it is natural for Men to do, who, from Motives of private Interest, contradict themselves. This, Sir, is a fair State of the Case, and if his Prussian Majesty has received any Intelligence of another Nature, he has been fo far deceived; and this, like many other Mifchiefs, ought to be placed to the Account of our Party Disputes, to which if any foreign Court trusts, it will be sure to be misled, since the Sentiments of the Nation are not to be fought for

among Pamphlets and News Writers, but from the Refolutions of the House of Commons, which is at once the natural and legal Representative of the People.

This Method, Sir, of which his Prussian Majesty is pleased to make choice, of rendering the Publick the Judge of his Proceedings, is such a one as certainly gives every Man who has competent Talents, a Right to examine the Question. I must own that I thought it a Piece of Respect due to fo great a Prince, and in addressing my felf to you, I aim at nothing more than shewing you what most People think of the Reasons his Majesty gives for acting in the manner he has done. If I had been fingular in my Sentiments, if I had heard Numbers declare themselves of another Mind, I should most certainly have been filent; but perceiving that the the rest of my Countrymen thought as I did, and observing how great a stress his Prussian Majesty is pleased to lay on the Sense of the British Nation, I really conceived that I could not better testify the Respect I have for that wise and powerful Monarch, than to take this Opportunity of transmitting to you the Sense of the British Nation upon this important Topick. It was a natural thing, on the Publication of fuch a Rescript, to expect it; the foreign Gazettes fay that 2000 of these have been distributed, and that one out of 2000 should take the liberty of speaking again, has nothing in it at all ftrange; but on the contrary, feems to answer the Design of that Piece, or at least of the Publication of it, and that too by the Order of the Prussian Minister, as expressed in the Title Page. I have one thing more to add, and that is, that I write purely from my own Motives, and not by any Order whatever. I exprefs express freely the genuine Sentiments of an unbiassed Englishman, and therefore, Sir, I hope you will hear me with Patience at least, if not with Favour, especially since I shall be careful to say nothing that deviates from the Respect due to so great a Prince, who expressly desires to have his Actions examined, and the Motives to them scanned.

The two chief Points upon which this Controverfy turns is the Conduct of the Queen of Hungary towards the Emperor, and the Conduct of Great-Britain towards the Queen of Hungary. If the former of these can be justified from the Law of Nature, Nations, and the Empire; if it can be proved that the Queen has done nothing but what she had a Right to do, what she was constrained to do, and what would have had a Tendency to hurt not herself only, but the Empire, if it had been omitted, then shall we undoubtedly get rid of this Part of the Charge, that the Pride, Ambition, and private Views of the House of Austria are the Causes of the prefent Troubles in Germany; and this being done, it will follow, that the Prince who has recourse to Arms for fo noble, fo generous a purpose as the restoring Peace to his long harrassed Country, will effect it by turning his Arms on these who are really the Authors of the War. In the next place, if we shew that Great-Britain has not affished the Queen of Hungary from any particular Views of her Prince, or from any ill-grounded Partiality of her People; but in Support of her own Interest, and in consequence of the Faith of Treaties founded on that Interest, we shall then have overturned the fecond Part of the Charge, and thereby free ourselves from the Imputation of intermeddling, without just Cause, with foreign Quarrels that do not concern us, and establish a Point which concerns us very nearly, viz. that what we have done for the Queen of Hungary, and what we shall do for her, though it turns immediately to her Service, turns at the same time, as much to ours, and is, in reality, no more than we are bound to do, not only in virtue of Treaties, but out of regard to our own Safety and Prefervation.

It is a Principle founded in common Sense, admitted by Grotius, Puffendorf, and all other able Writers on the Law of Nature and Nations, that all Government is founded on the Welfare of the People, that for this purpose they submit to fuch Constitutions as feem to them most fuitable to the Attainment of that End, that herein confifts the Right of Dominion. The Germanick Constitution is nothing more than a Confederacy of Princes and States, which, from their entering into that Confederacy, are stiled the Germanick Body, for the Preservation of the respective Forms of Government under which they live, and upon which they conceive their Happiness to be founded. It is this that renders an inviolable Regard and a fincere Attachment to that Constitution, Patriotism in Germany. It is this that renders any Attempt, not only to overturn and destroy, but to alter or change that Constitution, Treason in Germany. It was a just Sense of the Expediency, and even Necessity, of having a powerful Prince at the Head of this Confederacy, capable of supporting them in their Rights. by defending their Constitution against the Incroachments of Strangers, that induced them to continue the Imperial Dignity so long in the House of Austria, as it is very certain that the Power of the House of Austria,

Austria, especially in the last Century, has been chiefly employed in maintaining and preserving, as far as it was able, the Dominions of the lesser Princes of Germany, from the Incroachments of an ambitious Neighbour, always watching and constantly improving every Opportunity to aggrandize itself at their Expence, as appears from the many Cities and Provinces that have been torn from the Germanick Body, and at this Juncture are, and for a long Time have been, annexed to the Dominions of France.

The fame Spirit of Ambition, the fame Lust of Power, the same Desire of making all her Neighbours subservient to her Will, induced the French Monarchs of the House of Bourbon to diffurb the Peace of the rest of their Neighbours. and to endeavour, by Methods the most unjust and indefensible, to lessen their Power, in order to exalt her own. It was this Sense of common Danger, and Defire of providing for their own Safety by a strict Union amongst themfelves, that induced many of these Powers to ally themselves with the House of Austria and with the Empire; from whence arose the great Concern of many of the principal Powers in Europe, as well as the Empire in general, for the Support and Maintenance of the Power of that Family: Experience had shewn that nothing but the Power of the House of Austria employed in Defence of the Empire, could have preferved many of its Princes and States from being fwallowed up by the Power of France, which by the Germanick Body could be no other way confidered, than as a Diffolution; and a Mortification in the Political Body, like that in the Natural, being begun in the Members, must, by a certain Progression, have soon reached the Vitals.

Vitals. Experience had likewise shewn, that the other Powers of Europe had the greatest need of the Concurrence of the Empire as it was then constituted, that is to say, with a powerful and well-affected Prince at its Head, for the Preservation of their Freedom and Independency; and hence resulted that Concern which both the Empire and other Powers of Europe shewed for the Preservation and Support of the House of Austria; that is, the conserving all the Dominions in the actual Possessino of the late Emperor Charles VI. of glorious Memory, to his Heir, which was the Point aimed at by the Pragmatick Sanction, or Domestick Law of the Family, laid down by his Imperial Majesty then reigning.

The Pragmatick Sanction was made by the late Emperor Charles VI. in the Year 1713; in the Years 1724 and 1725, he caused it to be published and accepted in all his hereditary Dominions; and in the Year 1731, he communicated it to the Diet of the Empire; declaring at the fame Time, that as the Treaty he had lately made with his Britannick Majesty, in a great Measure secured the Ballance of Europe, so there wanted only a Resolution of the Diet in Support of the Pragmatick Sanction, to place that and the Tranquility of the Empire on the most folid His Imperial Majesty, at the same Foundation. Time afferted, "that it was in order to arrive " at fo falutary an end, that he had thought fit " to communicate to the Diet, in order to ob-" tain their Guaranty, the Order of Succession " in the most illustrious House of Austria, from an entire Confidence that as hitherto the Power " of the House of Austria had served as a Bulwark to all Christendom, had always defend-" ed, against every Aggressor, the Liberty of " Europe, and particularly that of their dear "Country, his Imperial Majesty did not doubt " but every State of the Empire would readily " acknowledge, that on the preferving intire and " indivisible this Power, depended not only the "Security of Europe in general, but also the "Welfare and Safety of the Empire in particu-His Imperial Majesty says farther, "that " it was not with any View to aggrandize his " Archducal House, that he communicated this " Decree, but merely to preferve to his Heirs " and Descendants, of both Sexes, his Domini-" ons and hereditary Countries undivided, and " that he expected this would meet with the lefs "Opposition, because this Order of Succession " was founded upon folemn Acts and Settlements " in the illustrious House of Austria, already ap-" proved by the Empire, and guaranty'd by "the chief Powers abroad, and by most of the " principal Potentates in the Empire." Imperial Majesty concludes with observing, "that "this Guaranty, instead of exposing the Em-" pire to any Inconvenience by engaging in its "Defence, would prove the only means of pre-" venting those Disturbances that must other-"wife naturally arife in relation to that Suc-" ceffion, and in which they would be obliged " to take part whether they would or not."

I am very forry that I am obliged to make so tedious a Recital to you, of a Thing with which you must be so well acquainted; but there prevails of late so strange a Humour of forgetting what ought to be best remembered, denying Facts notoriously known, and misrepresenting whatever makes against People, that I am oblig'd to be more explicit than I otherwise would. I cannot help observing to you, that this Decree shews shews the Wisdom and Foresight of the Emperor, as well as his paternal Care for the Welfare of his Country. His Wisdom appears in framing the Pragmatick Sanction; his Foresight in perceiving that the Debates about this Succession would embroil the Empire and all Europe; his Care and Tenderness in exhorting them to adhere steadily to this Guaranty, as the only means of avoiding and preventing these Mischiess. The States of the Empire were so well satisfied of the Truth of what his Imperial Majesty suggested to them, that they readily consented to what his Majesty desired of them.

In their Act of Guaranty they fay, that being fenfible "that the preferving the Domi-"nions of the House of Austria undivided, " was the only means of preventing the unhappy Divisions, Wars, and Effusion of Blood "that must necessarily happen in case the Em-" peror's Dominions were separated, and were " capable of fetting all Germany in a Flame, "they, after mature Deliberation upon this im-" portant Affair, and all the Circumstances at-"tending it, refolved to thank his Imperial " Majesty for his paternal Care, in endeavouring to prefent fo many Mischiefs, and for se-" curing the Honour and Safety of the Empire, and therefore take upon them the Guaranty as "he had demanded, agreeable to the fecond " Article of the Treaty of Vienna, by which " his Britannick Majesty took upon him the " fame Guaranty, which fecond Article is there-" in at length recited, and immediately after " the Words of this solemn Act of the Diet of " the Empire are, We by these Presents consent

"thereto, accepting it entirely, and declaring that we will defend this Order of Succession "fo

"fo as it is there established, against all who fhall oppose or trouble it; and will employ, for that effect, whenever it shall be requisite, all our Forces, and whatever shall be necessary for the Maintenance and Execution of this Guaranty of the Empire." This Resolution his Imperial Majesty most gratefully, as well as graciously, received, as appears by his Confirmation dated at Ratisbon, Feb. 4. 1732. and signed by the Prince of Furstenbourg, his Imperial Majesty's Commissary to the Diet.

It is visible, Sir, from hence, that if the Interests of Germany are at all understood by the Diet of the Empire, or if foreign Powers are to give any Credit to the most solemn Acts of that illustrious Affembly, the Pragmatick Sanction, and the Rights of the Queen of Hungary to all and every Part of the late Emperor's Dominions, are to be confidered as inviolable, and protected by an authentick Law of the Empire, grounded on the known Principles of its Laws, and the general Interest of all its Princes and States. This, Sir, I fay, is a thing rendered indifputable by the Acts which I have cited; for if after them any Doubt could be admitted in this Case, every Man of common Sense must perceive that there must be an End of all Certainty. If a German Prince, or if feveral German Princes concurring in the Affertion that this or that is for the Interest of Germany, ought to persuade foreign Nations that fo it really is, then, furely, fo folemn a Testimony as this is of the Sense of all the Princes and States of the Empire, that the preferving the Succession of the House of Austria whole and undivided, is of the utmost Confequence to the Safety and Preservation of the Germanick Body, is the fullest Evidence that either either German or Stranger can require. This is fo clear, fo full, fo much incapable of being subverted or overturned by any little Strokes of Cafuistry, that I venture to affirm whoever should undertake to prove the contrary, would meet with the Contempt of every Briton. You need not, therefore, wonder that we look upon the Succession of the Queen of Hungary as a thing founded upon Laws human and divine, and not to be altered or destroyed, but by the direct Breach of both.

This plain State of the Matter of Fact, shews, how little Foundation there is for all that has been faid about the Obstinacy and Intractability of the Queen of Hungary. Her Majesty had evidently an absolute Right to the Whole of her Father's Dominions, and could not possibly give up the smallest Part, without giving up, in some measure, her Right to the Whole; because the Prefervation of the Austrian Succession entire and indivisible, is the Motive that induced the Diet of the Empire to convert the Pragmatick Sanction, which was no more than an Oeconomical Constitution, into a Law of the Empire, from which, therefore, she could not depart, without departing from her Right to the Empire's Guaranty. To fay, therefore, that the Queen of Hungary has refused, and still refuses to listen to any Terms of Accommodation, founded on the giving any Satisfaction to the House of Bavaria, or any other Pretenders, is faying no more than that she is inflexibly just, that she adheres to the Laws of her Country, and that she will not be frighted into doing what she ought not, what, perhaps, she cannot do. There is a wide Différence, Sir, a very wide Difference between contending for what one conceives to be one's Right, and defending what one knows to be one's own; the former may be Obstinacy, but the latter never can. Besides, Sir, while the Queen of Hungary acts as she does, she has a Right to claim, not only the Guaranty of the Empire, but of all the other Powers, who guaranteed that Succession which she defends; but the Moment she consents to divide or alienate that Succession, she gives up that Right; and can you call her refusing to give it up Obstinacy? If so, Sir, you must alter all Languages as well as Laws; and teach us a new Dialect, in consequence of this new way of thinking.

From hence too appears the Nonsense of another Suggestion: Pardon the Expression, Sir, fince I am going to prove it is just. We have heard the Queen of Hungary accused for not fubmitting this Difpute to the Imperial Diet, and for not accepting the Mediation of the States of the Empire when offered, though it was certainly impossible for her to do either. Could she fubmit to the States of the Empire the Decision of that Point, which they had already decided in the most folemn manner, and upon which folemn Act of theirs her Right is founded? Or could she accept their Mediation after this their folemn Decision? Would not either of these have been a palpable Absurdity, and was she not extremely in the Right to save the States of the Empire, in their present Circumstances, the Shame of taking on themselves an Office they could not perform? Lay your Hand upon your Heart, Sir, and fay whether these Propositions were not made on purpose to draw her into this Dilemma, either of departing from her Right, which she must have done by submitting to the one, or accepting of the other; or giving her Enemies Enemies an Opportunity of charging her with Obstinacy for rejecting both. Alas! Sir, what Shifts are these? The Force of France and its Allies had been employed in vain to deprive her of her Dominions, and now this Stroke of Cunning was to come in, to deprive her of her Friends.

Let us consider, Sir, on the other side, what mighty Respect was paid to the Laws and Constitutions of the Empire, by the Adversary of the Queen of Hungary. He always declared that the Pragmatick Sanction was void, and that he confidered himself as the sole Heir of the Emperor Charles VI. He claimed that Succession immediately on the Death of that Emperor; he applied himself immediately to the Diet of the Empire as a Proof of knowing that he had a good Caufe. He fcorned all dark Intrigues, fecret Treaties, but above all foreign Assistance; and had fo tender a Regard for the Repose of the Empire, that he would have chose to have loft all he had fo good a Right to, rather than have called in the fworn Enemy of Germany to his Affistance. I really wonder, Sir, that somebody has not been found capable of afferting all this; because it is, at least, as true, and visibly much more to the Purpose, than any thing that has been faid. Yet you know, Sir, as well as I, that the Elector of Bavaria concealed the Nature of his Claim; guaranteed, as well as his Brother the Elector of Cologne, this very Pragmatick Sanction; even at the Death of the Emperor he was filent, till by a Confederacy shall  $\bar{\mathbf{I}}$  call it, or a Conspiracy, there was a Project formed for stripping the Heiress of the Emperor Charles VI. of all the Dominions, her Right to which had been in the most solemn Manner acknowledged by by every one of the Confederates; and in order to execute this righteous Scheme, such a Number of French Troops were poured into the Heart of Germany, as it was believed would put Justice out of Countenance, and fright such as had Virtue enough left not to join in so execrable a Scheme from daring to oppose it. These, Sir, are Truths, which however Posterity may doubt, the present Age, nay, the present Enemies of the Queen of Hungary, cannot deny; because, shameful as they are, they are at the same Time notorious.

Instead of avowing his Claim to the Diet, he took care to put it out of the power of the Diet to dispute it. Instead of calling upon the Queen of Hungary to submit their Disputes to the States of the Empire at Ratisbon, he talked of prescribing Terms to her on the Ramparts of Vienna. Instead of facrificing his own Pretenfions to the publick Peace, he modeftly expected she should facrifice her just Rights for the sake of preserving her own Person and that of her Children. But it so fell out that the Princess who was thus doomed to Destruction, had the Spirit to defend herfelf against all these Enemies, and by the Bleffing of God upon her Arms, she has been able, not only to preserve her own, but by the just Rights of War, is become Mistress of the Territories of the Invader. Sir, is the great Crime imputed to the Queen of Hungary, and to her Allies. I have often wondered that those who have dealt so freely with their Conduct, did not attack the first of her Allies, I mean the Lord of Hosts, the God of Battles; he who has fo fignally interpofed in her Favour, and fo heavily chastised the perfidious Breakers of Treaties; those who in the midst of all their political Wisdom, said in their Hearts with the Fool, There is no God.

It is allowed that Bavaria has fuffered deeply. but it was after Austria had been plundered; it is admitted that the Inhabitants of that Country have been hardly dealt with, but scarcely so hard as the Bohemians. It is owned that they deferve Pity and Compassion; and so surely do the other Countries that have felt the Scourge of this dreadful War. But on whom, Sir, are all the Evils to be charged, or who is in Conscience answerable for Events that all Parties condemn. all Parties are ashamed of? Those surely by whom the War was begun. Those, who not only fet the Example of these Sufferings, but made it necessary for others to continue them. Those, who to gratify their own private Interests and Ambition, actually overturned the Constitution of their Country, that Constitution they pretend now to be fo fond of, and left no Authority in Germany but Force, no Right but that of the Sword. Have these People a Right to complain of these Mischiess they have introduc'd? Shall they call for Justice on the Heads of those who on the fide of Justice took up Arms; or, not content with Impunity, shall they dare, in the Sight of all the World, to attempt, by gloffing their Iniquities, to fix the odious Term of Traitors to their Country upon others? This, Sir, is deeper Policy than Machiavel ever taught, and those who have studied him fo affiduously will find that the present Age is too wife, and too penetrating at least, if not too virtuous, to be imposed on. There might be perhaps Times, when fine Words would fanctify foul Actions; but Men in our Days have too much Wit not to diffinguish between a Felon that that speaks well, and an honest Man that complains of being robb'd. I am forry, heartily forry, that I am obliged to make use of such Terms; but when People attempt to abuse the common Sense of Mankind, every Man is bound to vindicate the Sense he has left; and when those who have the framing publick Papers, not only abuse Facts, but pervert Language, every private Man is bound to interpose, and prevent their confounding the Notions of Right and Wrong.

If Bavaria has been over-run, it was owing to the Ambition of her Prince; if its Inhabitants are in the most miserable Condition they may thank his Allies; if they do not enjoy the Benefit of Capitulations; why did they break them? That their Prince is driven out of his Dominions is true; that their Country is defolate and their Cities demolished, is not to be disputed; that they are treated as a conquered Nation is acknowledged and avowed; but the Queen of She was forced to do all Hungary is guiltless. this in her own Defence; and if she has inflicted Punishments against the Clemency of her Nature, it has been to preferve her Subjects whose Lovalty required it at her Hands. Would you have had her left these Countries to the Pretender to her own Dominions? Would you have had her return the Weapon to a desperate Enemy? or, from a Principle of false Compassion, would you have had her risked the Safety of her own Perfon, merely to prevent the Sufferings of one, who, notwithstanding their Nearness in Blood, had involved their Country in fuch difinal Confusions? Whoever expects such things shews himself a Patron of Absurdities, and is so visible an Enemy to Reason, that there is no arguing with him.

It is to avoid fuch palpable, fuch glaring Marks of Falshood and Folly, that a different Turn is given to the Difpute, and new Sounds are introduced to prevent our difcerning that the Sense is the same. The Emperor, the Chief of the Empire, the Head of Germany, are now the favourite Phrases. But, for God's sake, did the Queen of Hungary attack the Emperor? did she despoil him of his Imperial Dignity? was it she that made him the Pensioner of France? The Truth of the Matter You cannot fav this. is, that the Elector of Bavaria, who began a most unjust War upon the first Elector of the Empire, and in the Course of that War lost his Dominions, is now Emperor; and what then? Has this changed the Nature of Things? Can it have any Effect upon what has been long fince done? will it operate upon his past Actions, and make that a lawful and a just War, which at the Time he enterprised it was against the Constitution of the Family, the folemn Act of the Empire, the Faith of numberless Treaties, and the Law of Nations? If not, what fignifies ringing Emperor, Head of Germany, and Sovereign of the Empire in our Ears? or what has the Queen of Hungary done to deferve it? But, fay some People, she has protested, and that too in very unguarded Why, grant it were fo; People who are greatly injured have not always the greatest Patience. But against what has she protested? Not against bis Election; you know that well enough; but against the Injury done ber in his Election; against the taking away her Vote; contrary to the Golden Bull, which in spite of Commissorial missionial Decrees, Manisesto's, and Expositions, is and will be the Constitution of the Empire so long as it subsists.

On the whole, therefore, this is a new Controversy about Words. The Queen of Hungary maintains and defends the Germanick Constitution by her Protest, and here are a new set of extraordinary Patriots started up, who, by a single Stroke of political Equivocation, would turn this Act of Loyalty to the Constitution into Treason, and arm the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire against an innocent Princess shall I fay? no, against themselves, against their own Rights, their own Privileges, and that very Affembly which pretends to demand their Af-What Madness! What Infatuation! The Elector of Mentz, who is Archchancellor of the Empire, has transmitted this Paper to the Dictature of the Empire, without feeing the least Harm in it. His Majesty of Great-Britain, who is likewise an Elector of the Empire, and to use the new Phrase, though it is bad English, as respectable a Prince as any in the Empire, has, in his Letters to the Emperor, unanswerably proved, that it was what her Majesty of Hungary had a Right to do, and what it ill became his Imperial Majesty to dispute. It is certainly, therefore a well judged thing to tell the English Nation that they have nothing to do with the Affairs of Germany, and that they ought not to enquire into German Disputes: Why? Because those Disputes will not bear an Enquiry; and the English Nation have naturally fuch a Love to Truth, and fuch a Capacity of discovering on which fide it lies, that there is no blinding them with fuch fallacious Flourishes as compose that bom-Е bast Eloquence, which distinguishes the three last Commissionial Decrees.

But I would not, Sir, have you mistake me in this Matter, or rather I would not afford you an Opportunity of pretending to mistake me so far, as to infer from hence, that I either think it reasonable to depose the Emperor, believe that to be the Queen of Hungary's Design, or maintain that Great Britain is bound either by Treaty, or by Interest, to support her in it, if it was. All I pretend to shew is, that the Election of his Imperial Majesty has nothing to do with the Dispute about the Austrian Succession; and if I am not much mistaken, his present Imperial Majesty promises in one of the Articles of his Capitulation, that he will never involve the Empire in any private Dispute of his, which shews that the Empire could have nothing to do in this War, even if he were in the right. But though it be true, that no Law could oblige the Queen of Hungary to part with Bavaria, which is her's by the Laws of Arms, which as I observed before was the only Law that prevailed in Germany when fhe acquired it; yet I readily admit that it is not decent to deprive so near a Relation, or to express my Sentiments openly and freely, his innocent Posterity of their patrimonial Inheritance; and I likewise admit that it is not for the Honour of Germany, to have at her Head a Prince deprived of his Dominions, and especially deprived of them, as he has been, in Consequence of a War begun in direct opposition to the Laws of the Empire. These, I dare say you will allow to be great Concessions, but they are the Concessions of a Man, who has nothing in view but the Truth, who is not enthusiastically devoted to the Queen of Hungary's Interest, but who could as readily discern Injustice or Ambition in the House of Austira, as in any other House, if there was sufficient Marks to distinguish them by.

But, Sir, it so falls out, that the Queen of Hungary, who claims the whole and undivided Succession of the House of Austria under the Pragmatic Sanction, as approved and guaranteed by the Diet of the Empire, is entirely governd by the fame Principles, that induced his Imperial Majesty of ever glorious Memory her Father, to expect that Guaranty, and so wise, so prudent, and fo illustrious an Assembly to grant In the midst of Persecution, she has preferved her Magnanimity, and while cover'd with opprobrious Language by her Adverfary, has been studying his Interest. Her Politicks have been always founded upon Maxims of Truth and Justice, and with a Heart entirely German she has been contriving to make a great and independant Monarch of that Prince, whose Emissaries have charged her with a Design of dethroning This, Sir, is indeed an extraordinary Contrast; it is in every Circumstance so fair, so full, and fo agreeable to the Rules of Rhetoric that I am under some Apprehensions, my Readers will fuspect me of aiming at Eloquence, while I am endeavouring only, in the plainest Terms, to lay down a certain Truth; and it gives me great Satisfaction to think, that weak as my Abilities are, this Caufe cannot suffer by my handling it; fince as the Croats and Pandours rush'd from their Dens and Caverns, possessed with a Spirit of Justice, that render'd them an Overmatch for the regular Troops of France; fo a Man of the most ordinary Understanding, having the Merits of this Cause imprinted in his Mind, may may defend it against the greater Masters of Words.

That wife and good Princess long ago foresaw that the best Expedient for settling the Peace of Germany was to fix the Emperor in his Throne, and to invest him truly with that Sovereignty of which he has now only the Shadow: I fay, Sir, even now only the Shadow; now, when his Court shines at the Expence of France, and his Power feems to be supported by the Arms of Her Majesty of Hungary saw with deep Concern the Diftress of a Prince, would have buried herfelf, her Children, and her Family for ever in the Ruins of Vienna, and was scarce in Safety before she busied herself about She imputed that Conduct which had fo strong an Appearance of Malice to Delusion; to that Delufion, which has afforded France an Opportunity of boafting, that she has given Refuge to Kings dethroned, and shelter'd Princes in Exile. She labour'd by every possible Method to deliver his Imperial Majesty from this unprincely Bondage. She would have divorced him from that Interest, which is not more opposite to her's than his own. She would have inspired him with Sentiments worthy his Imperial Robes; or rather by removing his Prejudices, she would have render'd those Virtues conspicious, which none can deny his Imperial Majesty possesses. tues, which recommended him to the Choice of all the Electors, and Virtues most unhappily obfcured by his fatal Adherence to that perfidious Court, whose Intrigues have involved his Country, and all Europe, in fuch Calamities. Such are the Injuries the Queen of Hungary intended him. Such were the Methods by which she fought to revenge the Injuries he had done her. Such were the the Schemes and Projects for dethroning the Head of the Empire; and fuch the Reasons that ought to arm the Empire against her!

That she had not the same Tenderness and Regard for France, did not proceed from a rancorous unrelenting Disposition, as has been most basely infinuated by the Pens under the Direction of that Court, but from a calm and moderate Pursuit of her own Safety, and the Publick Good. She faw plainly that her own Succession could never be fecure, while France retain'd the Power of hurting her; she was convinced that the States of the Empire could never exert themfelves in the Maintenance of their Guaranty to that Succession, while France could awe them; fhe difcern'd with no less Certainty, that her Neighbours were in equal Danger; and that the Maritime Powers especially could no more promife themselves quiet than herself, if that Power, which no Treaties could bind, was not fo circumscribed as to lose in some Measure the Capacity of hurting. But what then was the Scheme she form'd? For I have already owned, and I still own, that fair Pretences are not always to be trusted. Was it a Scheme to enlarge her own Dominions at the Expence of France? Was it a Project for repairing the Losses she had suffered by the Intrigues of that Crown, by annexing to her Territories, what was pared from the Robberies of the other? Nothing like it. thought, and a most equitable Thought it was, that an Opportunity offer'd for recovering from France, what in Times of publick Confusion, fuch as these, France had stolen from the Empire; and it was proposed that these very Dominions should have been given to the Emperor, as a just Reparation for the Losses he has sustained by by the wicked and treacherous Arts of France. This was the Object of the Queen's Views, and from the Pursuit of this glorious Object was the young Hero of Lorrain recalled by the Invasion of Bobenia.

I am fensible, Sir, that it will be an unpleasing Subject to you, tho' I know not why it should be so; but, at the same Time, it is so material to my Purpose, that I must take the Liberty of pointing out to you the Advantages, that must have followed from the putting this Scheme in Execution, and which, by the Way, nothing could have prevented, but the paradoxical Method of giving Peace to Germany by recalling thither the War, which had been transferred into the Territories of France. In the first Place, Sir, it would have restored to Germany a large Extent of Country, every Foot of which had been taken away by Methods the most unjustifiable that were perhaps ever used. For the three Bishopricks were seiz'd under the Notion of a Sequestration, Alface obtain'd by Fraud, and the City of Strasburgh surprized by open Force, in a Time of a full Peace, and when all France blush'd at the Fact, except the barbarous Minister that directed, and the ambitious Monarch that permitted it. This alone must have had happy Consequences, because it must have remov'd the Terror of the French Arms from four of the German Electors. In the next Place, it would have been a noble Accession to the Territories of the Prince for whom they were defigned; and to mention no more, it would, in the third Place, have given fuch Spirit to the desponding Powers of Europe, as would probably have secured them, for an Age at least, against the Force and Intrigues of France. All these Advantages would have have accrued immediately to the Emperor and Empire, and confequentially only to the Queen of Hungary and her Allies, by whose Arms, and at whose Expence they were to be obtain'd, not by a dark and clandestine Alliance, grounded on Motives of Private Interest, transacted in a Time of Peace, but in a fair and open War, in which the Crown of France itself was the Aggressor.

I know it may be objected, that the Emperor's Honour was too deeply concerned for him to fuffer fuch a Proceeding. But methinks, Sir, the Force of this Objection is very much weaken'd, if not entirely destroy'd, if we confider that tho' all this was to be done for, yet nothing was to be done by the Emperor. He was not defired to break Faith with, or to attack, him, who is falfly called his Benefactor. He was already out of a Capacity of making War, and was brought into this weak and defenceless a Condition by the Contrivance of this very Power. This is a Fact fo certain in itself, and so well known in Germany and to all Europe, that I might be dispensed from the Pains of proving it. But that I may give no room for suggesting, that I take Things upon trust, and affert what I cannot make good, give me leave, Sir, to put you in mind of a Proof, that I take to be invincible; I mean the Difgrace of Marshal Broglio, procured by the direct Application of the Emperor himself, for betraying, deferting, and delivering up his hereditary Dominions. A Man who had the Confidence to avow his Hatred of Germans in the Heart of Germany, and who treated with the utmost Contempt the Imperial Troops, notwithstanding they behaved upon all Occasions much better than his own. Man's Difgrace, I fay, is an unquestionable

Proof of the Truth of what I affert; for it can never be supposed, that a Prince of so much Virtue, Prudence and Moderation, as the Emperor is allowed to be, would have accused that Man without Grounds, or that the French King and his Ministers would have given him up to the Emperor's Resentments, if the Accusation had not been well supported. It is not therefore easy to discern how his Imperial Majesty's Honour could have suffered by accepting Territories recover'd from France; to which she neither has, nor can have any just Title.

From these Premises may be deduced the clearest and most satisfactory Answers to the two Points which are most strongly insisted upon, in the Charge against the Queen of Hungary, and in Support of the new Treaty of Union. The first of them is the detaining the Emperor's hereditary Countries, which upon this Plan it is plain she could not restore with Safety to herself, or to the common Caufe. All the Clamour that has been raifed about this, is absolutely false and groundless, and not to be reconciled to the Laws of War or Peace, to the Maxims of Policy, or of common Sense; and therefore the detaining them could not be any Breach of the Germanic The Emperor indeed might have Conftitution. taken a Method, which would have given some Colour to his Complaint; he might have renounced his Alliance with France, but then the Complaint would have been loft, because in that Case he had been long ago in Possession of his But while he remain'd attach'd to Dominions. that Court, was supported by that Court, and employed the Remains of his Authority merely in executing the Dictates, and fulfilling the Purposes of that Court, to the visible Prejudice of the the Empire, as well as the Queen of Hungary. I fay, while he was doing all this, and perhaps more, I mean stirring up the Bavarians to Plots and Conspiracies, the expecting the Queen of Hungary to restore his Dominions, or the imputing it to her as a Crime, that she did not restore them, is past all Understanding. Did ever the Laws of Honour oblige a Person who had disarmed another in a Duel, to restore his Adverfary his Sword, while he was manifestly in a Temper of attempting to do the same Mischief with it again, of the Power of doing which he was deprived but the Moment before? No, certainly; the nicest Laws of Honour require no fuch Thing; and whenever the Advocates for the Treaty of Union shall shew either Law or Reason, why the Queen of Hungary should tempt Providence, by fuch an Act of Rashness, I shall be ready to own that Treaty is not altogether without Foundation.

But, fays the Exposition, that notable Piece which drew upon you this Trouble, the Emparor did more; for he offer'd to renounce his Pretentions to the Austrian Succession, which would have put an End to the Dispute. how can we be fure of that? The House of Bavaria had renounced all Claims, and had guaranteed this very Pragmatic Sanction before; so had the Crown of France, and received a Confideration for it; but they made War against the Queen of Hungary, with a View to disposses her of that Succession which they had acknowledged and guaranteed. Why? because they imagin'd at the Conjuncture they attack'd her, they had Force sufficient to do what never could have been justified, if done. It is plain therefore, if any thing can be plain, that the Queen of Hungary had as little Reason to trust to a new Renunciation as to the old Guaranty; or a least, she had no reason to trust to it, till she had fome collateral Security for the Performance, which she might have had, if in Conjunction with her Allies, she had recover'd the Provinces torn from the Empire by France; and the Emperor had renounc'd his Alliance with that Crown, and had given a fufficient Pledge for his Sincerity in that Renunciation. This, and this only, could fecure the Queen of Hungary in the Possession of her own Dominions; and this would the fame Time have fecured her Allies from the Dread of being called upon again, to execute their Guaranty of the Pragmatic Sanction. is a Fact fo true, that nobody disputes it, that the Prefent War is a heavy Burden on the Queen of Hungary, and on her Allies; but heavy as the Burthen is, it is still more tolerable than a rotten Peace, which would infallibly ruin both her and her Allies.

The other Objection is grounded on the Treatment given to the Bavarian Troops, fince they affum'd the Title of the Neutral Army of the Empire. It is complain'd of in the strongest Terms that the Queen of Hungary, forgetting the Tenor of her own Capitulations, little refpecting the facred Name of the Empire, and having nothing in View but the aggrandizing her own Power at the Expence of the Liberty and Peace of Germany, first forced these Imperial Troops to take Shelter under the Cannon of an Imperial Fortress, and then attempted to destroy them under that Fortress, notwithstanding the Expostulations of a Field-Marshal of the Empire, who was at the fame Time Governor of that Fortress. This, I dare say, Sir, you will allow is the Case of the Accusation fairly stated; but when the Matter comes to be freely examin'd, and the Circumstances attending these Facts are looked into, the Queen of Hungary's Conduct appears to be irreproachable, because every Step the has taken, was render'd necessary by her Enemy's bad Conduct, and Breach of Faith. That a Neutrality was granted to the Army under the Command of Count Seckendorf, is a Point that admits of no Dispute; but from that very Neutrality it appears, that the Confideration upon which it was granted, was the Bavarian Armies remaining neuter, that is to fay, detaching themselves from the Queen's Enemies, till by the Mediation of Powers, well affected to both, the Queen and the Emperor could be made Now, Sir, I will take upon me to fay, that so long as this Neutrality was observ'd on one Side, it was never violated on the other. The Imperial Troops remain'd quietly in their Quarters, the Archives of the Electoral House of Bavaria, the rich Furniture of the Electoral Refidence, were transferr'd from Augsbourg to Francfort, and these, Sir, I hope, are not among the Number of those Cruelties, Barbarities and Outrages, of which the Emperor's new Friends fo heavily complain. Thus far, Sir, Things went as they should do, the Emperor liften'd to Proposals, the Queen made continual Concessions, and his Britannnic Majesty, after exposing his Person in Defence of Germany, underwent incredible Fatigues in endeavouring every. Method he could devise to put an End to the War by a speedy and a solid Peace.

But in the midst of all these Cares, with which the Friends of Freedom were affected, it began to be observed, that the Imperial Army was conftantly recruting, Arms, Ammunition and Equipages were provided for them, and publickly paid for by Remittances from France. As foon as the Season for Action approached, there begun to be great Stirs in Bavaria, and those who complain'd so heavily of the Queen's raising Contributions in that Country, know that one Reason for raising them, was to prevent the drawing great Sums out of that Electorate for the Payment of Troops that were to fight against her. And you must likewise know too, that those Severities that are represented in so dreadful a Light, were no other than necessary Precautions for preventing private Conspiracies, and cutting the Throats of Austrian Garrisons in their Beds. By Degrees, as the new Projects of France began to ripen, the Imperial Troops quitted their Quarters, and disposed themselves in fuch a Manner as very plainly shew'd they were at the Devotion of that Court, that had now declar'd War against the Queen of Hungary, and was preparing to attack her with all it's At last a French Army takes Post in fuch a Manner, as to be cover'd on one fide by an Imperial Fortress, and the same Imperial Fortress covers the Neutral Imperial Army on the other, while the Velt Marshal of the Empire was at once Commander in Chief of the Bavarian Forces, now in Motion in Breach of a Neutrality, Governor of an Imperial Fortress that cover'd a French Army, and Conjunct in Command with a Marshal of France at the Head of that Army, whose only Errand it was to attack the Queen. In fuch Circumstances, Sir, you must allow me to fay, that if the Queen's Hungarian Officers, who are better Soldiers than Statesmen, misapprehended Things a little, and look'd upon thefe Neutral Neutral Troops as Enemies, it was a very pardonable Mistake. I think in my Conscience, Sir, that a Man of your Modesty would scarce venture to affert, that they ought to have look'd upon them as Friends. To cut the Matter short, and to speak freely what I think, there never was so ridiculous a Farce play'd as this, which was defign'd to give Birth to so serious an Affair as the Treaty of Union at Francfort, and the Invasion of Bohemia in Consequence of that Treaty; you must allow, Sir, that I have not followed the modern Fashion of exaggerating Things, but have treated this Matter as foftly and tenderly as possible; for had I written in the new Style, I should have charged the Emperor with breaking the Neutrality, with violating the most folemn Capitulations, and thereby exposing his Subjects, his brave and loyal Subjects, who have deferv'd fo much better at his Hands, to all the Severities they have met with fince.

On the whole therefore, these Complaints are either without Foundation, or if there be any Foundation for a Complaint, it is not certainly against the Queen of Hungary. She did not begin the War, therefore the Confequences of the War cannot in Justice be imputed to her. She did not despoil the Elector of Bavaria of his hereditary Countries, from a Thirst of Dominion. but from a laudable Defire of removing the Seat of War from among her Subjects. She does not withhold these Dominions from an ambitious Defire of extending her own Power, but as a Pledge of her being indemnified for what she has lost on the one Hand; and on the other, because she cannot with Safety restore them. If she protested against the Election of the present Emperor, it was because her Vote in electing him was set aside:

aside; and if other Princes are so jealous of their Rights, as to draw their Swords on a Suspicion of being injur'd, what was there Criminal in her Paper-Protest, not grounded on a Suspicion, but on an Injury receiv'd? If the has attacked France, France first attack'd her; and the prefent Conjuncture shews, that she never can be fafe till France has lost its Influence in the Empire; which illicit, which dangerous Influence, was all that the attempted to take away. If the granted a Neuttality to the Emperor's Troops, it was an Act of Compassion, for she had them in her Power. If she broke that Neutrality, it was because she could not in Prudence stay till her Enemies broke it. If she has attempted to put Garrisons into Imperial Towns, it was to prevent their being possessed by the French. If the has at any Time acted contrary to the System of the Empire, it was because the Emperor, under French Counfels, had fo confused that System, that it could no longer be regarded. In a Word, whatfoever she has done, she has done to fecure the German Nation against France, its natural, its implacable Enemy; and against Gallicited Germans, who trusting to the specious Promifes of France, are in Arms for her against their Country. These, Sir, are Truths, incontestable Truths, which will for ever justify the Conduct of the Queen of Hungary, and the Conduct of the Allies of the Queen of Hungary, the present Age, and to all Posterity. " Il justify her, Sir, so long as the Constitution of the Empire remains, and the Laws of Nature and Nations are understood. If, indeed in this critical Conjuncture, French Perfidy should get the better of German Probity, and the Power of that all-grasping Crown should be too hard for the the Friends of Freedom, Wrong and Right may be so consounded, as not to be distinguished, and common Sense may be declared Treason. But while a Spark of Liberty remains, while we yet dare think as we ought, and speak as we think, we must conclude that the Queen of Hungary and her Allies, have made a most glorious Stand, and that all the Attempts that are, or may be made, to set this in another Light, are Attempts to deceive those who cannot be enslav'd by all the Force their Enemies can employ against them.

There is but one Point more I shall touch, and then I have done with this part of my Subiect? and that is the Conduct of the Princes and States of the Empire. All of these that embrac'd the Imperial, that is, the French Party, were visibly biass'd either by Hopes or Fears; such as disdain'd the one, and were above the other, fided with the Queen of Hungary as far as they were able, and if any have fince left her, Threats or Promifes have taken them off. While they were free, while they were independant, or to use a stronger, a more expressive Word, while they were GERMANS, they were for the Queen of Hungary; but fince this fatal Change, fince its become fashionable to call French Influence the Germanick Conftitution, they may perhaps be obliged to speak the Language of the Times, a Language foreign to their Hearts, and, as it will hereafter appear, foreign to their Interests. ture Events, Sir, are in the Womb of Time, and lie beyond the Reach of human Forefight; but whatever those Events may be, whatever may befall the Queen of Hungary, or her Allies, both she and they have put this out of the Reach of Time and Fortune; that Duty and not Interest

I want Words to express the rest, and so I leave it.

But if Zeal for Liberty, if the Desire of maintaining Publick Faith, if the pure Intention of doing Right for the Sake of doing right, can draw down the Divine Bleffing on an Appeal to Providence in the way of Arms, the Queen of Hungary will be still victorious; victorious over the Arts and Frauds, as well as over the Armies of France and her Partizans; victorious in the Cause of Germany, Europe, Liberty, and Man-In the Hopes of this, Sir, let us live; for without these Hopes, what should we live for? To fee our constant and natural Allies ruin'd by their own Folly, fwallow'd up by an ambitious Neighbour, while we have nothing more to expect than to be last devoured. A Fate which to avoid, what Danger is there which we should not despife?

I am now come to the fecond Part of my Task, which is to defend the Conduct of Great Britain, since the present War begun; and it salls out very happily for me that there cannot well be any Thing imagin'd more easily to be defended. I am not undertaking either a knotty Argument on the Right Side, or attempting to give plausible Colours to what in my own Conscience I know to be wrong; but I am to shew that the British Nation in general, who by their Representatives fentatives in Parliament, so often recommended to his Majesty this War, in the Cause of the Queen of Hungary, in Support of the Ballance of Power, and in Maintenance of the Freedom of Europe, were guided by that good Sense, which the wisest Nation in Europe allow them; by that generous, open and beneficent Spirit of assisting their oppressed Neighbours, for which they have been, and may they always be distinguished! This is what I have undertaken, and this may be with such Facility perform'd, that I have not the least Fear so good a Cause should fuffer, even in so weak Hands as mine.

You know, Sir, that the Guaranty of the Pragmatic Sanction, was given by the most folemn Treaty by the Crown of Great-Britain; and that this Treaty was maturely examin'd, and in the most authentic Manner approv'd by Parliament. To fay the Truth, Sir, it could not be otherwise; for without deferting that System which the Nation, I fay the Nation, Sir, has always embrac'd, we could not defert the House of Austria. It was not the Revolution, as some People imagin'd, that gave this Turn to our Politicks; but it was the Court's endeavouring to give another Turn to our Politicks, that brought about the Revolution. In the Days of King Charles II. the People, the Parliament, and every Man of Parts and Probity in the Council, were as much attach'd to this System as they are now; and for the very fame Reafon, because they thought it their Interest, and that the Independency of Britain could not be maintain'd without it.

The Act therefore of guarantying the Pragmatic Sanction, was the Act of the Crown, but the Approbation of the Legislature has made it the Act of the Nation; and may we cease to be a Nation whenever we hefitate at performing what the Faith of the Nation has been pledged to perform. When the Queen of Hungary was attacked, when a Combination was formed to strip her of those Territories, in the possession of which the Faith of this Nation was given that she should be maintained, what could we do less than we did? or what must all Europe have thought of us, if we had refused to comply with our Engagements? That there was a flowness in doing this, I have already observ'd, was the chief Cause for over-turning the late Administration; and it is a Point of Justice due to a great Man, then at the Head of the Opposition, and lately at the Helm of our Affairs, that he has been perfectly uniform in his Conduct, that he is done in Power what he declared to be right when out; and that in this respect he has set his Probity on the level with his Parts, and shewn himfelf at once an honest and an able Minister. This. I fay, is a Piece of Justice that his very Enemies cannot deny him, and in this no doubt he has shewn himself truly a Patriot. He caught his Affection for the House of Austria from the Voice of the People, they avow'd the Interest of that House, and the Interest of this Nation to be the fame; and therefore whatever the Fate of the War may be, they never can difavow him or his Measures in this respect. His Instructions are to be found in the Addresses of Parliament, and if they were dictated to him by the Crown, the Crown was first advised to them These are Facts, Sir, which by the Nation. the Exposition makes it necessary for me to call to Remembrance, that the Infinuations thrown out there, as if this was a War contriv'd by a Ministry. niftry, and supported by a Party, may appear in the Light they deserve; for most unquestionably, if there was a thing to which the whole Nation made itself a Party, it was this War in favour of the Queen of Hungary; and I hope the British Spirit will never fink so low as to be asham'd of it.

That we gave her at first such Assistance, as her Circumstances and our own would allow, was a Mark of our Sincerity, and a Pledge to her of our performing strictly our Engagements. That we went farther and increased our Assistance, and engaged at last our whole Force in her Quarrel, was the Effect of the Turn the War took, which quickly convinced us, that we were not more engaged by the Faith of Treaties, to support the Queen of Hungary, than by our Interest to oppose the Progress of that ambitious Power, which now visibly disclosed its Defign of enflaving all Europe. We proportioned our Succours according to the Necessity of the Queen and our own Circumstances, till it was evident that we were ourselves no less deeply concern'd than she; and we did not enter as Principals into this War, till France display'd the whole of her Scheme; and shew'd that the Destruction of this Nation, that is to fay, the Freedom and Independency of this Nation, was a part of it. That we executed our Guaranty of the Pragmaic Sanction, was doing what we ow'd to public Faith, that for doing this, and thereby croffing the Views of France, we provoked her to declare War, was a thing we could not help, for fure the British Nation will never think a Breach of Faith a proper Expedient to avoid any War; but more especially to avoid a War with France, when actually engaged  $G_{2}$ in the Execution of a Project to overturn the Liberties of Europe. As Auxiliaries therefore to the Queen of Hungary we acted as became us, and that we are now Principals in the War, is because it is our own Interest, and we fight for ourselves, so that the War is now our own, and we affist the Queen of Hungary, because her Enemy is ours.

This, Sir, is the true State of the Case, and it will be found fo whenever it shall come to be examin'd with that Coolness and Discretion which it deferves by competent Judges. For however things may be represented either in the private Conversations of Men, who love to live well together, and therefore naturally give in to each others Notions; or in Party Cabals, which are no less dangerous to true Politicks than to true Religion, fince they first produce an hypocritical Faith, back'd with strong Asseverations of Belief against real Conviction, which generally ends in Atheism, or the abandoning of all Principles; in both Cases, I say, however this Question may be decided among such Junto's, yet upon a fair Hearing in a full Assembly of the Representatives of the British People, things will come out exactly as I have stated them.

It will then appear that the Ruin of the House of Austria, was only the first Step in the French Plan, and that from thence they would have proceeded to change the general System of Europe. But you will demand how will this appear; to which I answer, by considering the Force France employed for this Purpose. If the obtaining some Satisfaction for the House of Bevaria, had been all that was in View, it might surely have been brought about without such an Armament, as in the first Instance, cost France twice the Value of a reasonable Equivalent. But this was not the Cafe; nay, it was never pretended to be the Case, till very lately. The first avowed Design was to transfer all the Dominions of the House of Austria to that of and this I must confess was the only cause that could be avow'd: For the Elector of Bavaria was either the Heir of all the Dominions of the House of Austria, or of none. claims by a Pragmatick Sanction, as well as the Queen of Hungary; and his Claim, to use a coarse Expression, stands upon as broad a Bottom. But now, to fay nothing of the Injustice of France in guarantying one Pragmatick Sanction, and arming in Favour of another, what Reason is there to believe that she meant the Design she avowed? If the Elector of Bavaria was to be the universal Heir of the Austrian Dominions, how came the Crown of Spain to enter into the War? What could induce the King of Poland to take the Share in it he did? Or how could France have enter'd into Engagements with his Prussian Majesty? The Partition of the Austrian Succession, was as much against the Interest, as much against the Right of the Elector of Bavaria, supposing him to have any Right to that Succession, as the Partition of the Queen of Hungary's Dominions, is against the Nature of that Title by which she possesses them.

France

Thus, Sir, I prefume to fay, that I have made it clear to the meanest Capacity, that the Design of France was as little to establish the Claim of the House of Bavaria, as that of the House of Austria; and if that was not her Design, what in the Name of God could be her Design, but to overturn and destroy that System which has been form'd to set Bounds to her Power ?

Power? to secure the rest of Europe from the Effects of her Ambition, and to preferve our Constitution, Liberties and Commerce, from that Ruin, which must overwhelm them, whenever the Power of France rifes as high as her And now, Sir, I would be glad to Ambition. know, why any Foreign Prince should presume in the Stile of the Exposition, to question the Right of the British Government, to interfere in the Affairs of Germany, at a Time when it was most visible that the Affairs of Germany, were in Fact our own. When the Confideration was not, whether we should take a share in the War. but whether we should take it sooner or later; whether we should take it in Compliance with Treaties, in Support of our Allies, while it lay at a Distance, and while it was in our power to prevent the Calamities that were coming upon us, by opposing our Enemies in Time, or whether by illuding our Treaties, we should stay till our natural Allies were undone, till the Force of our Enemy was irrefiftible, till our Oppression would have been inforced by invincible Necesfity, and we should have had as little Title to Compassion in the Day of our Destruction, as we had to Honour in pursuing so base, so pusilanimous a Conduct, when there was a possibility of refifting that Torrent, by which we must then have been overborne? A most excellent Scheme of Policy indeed.

The Conduct of France, for you know, Sir, it is lawful to learn from Enemies, the Conduct of France ought to teach us better Things. Is there Wisdom and Policy in France? Did this Wisdom and Policy appear in the Measures she took for compassing her Design; in the immense Sums of Money squander'd in the North;

in the vast Subsidies granted to German Princes. in the March of fuch mighty Armies into a distant Country, to be maintain'd there at almost inconceivable Expence? Did, I fay, her Wifdom and Policy appear in all this, and would it at the fame time have been Wisdom and Policy in us, to have fet still with our Arms before us, while all this was doing? No, furely, nor common Senfe. When the Gallick Cock struts. crows, and claps his Wings, it can never be a fit Season for the British Lion to slumber. If the Quarrels of Germany be nothing to us, what are they to France? If she has nothing to fear, nothing to hope, nothing to defire, as she sometimes pretends from the Issue of these Quarrels, why does she meddle in them? Why does she profusely squander away her Men and Money in the Maintenance of them? Why does she compass Sea and Land? Why does she move Heaven and Earth to give a certain Turn to those Quarrels, if that Turn is not to be to her Advantage? If that Turn is not to be advantagious to her in a Degree proportionable to her Expence? If that Turn is not in Futurity to compenfate the exhausting herself for the present, the throwing away all her Money, the thinning her Country of Men, the putting almost a full Stop to her Commerce, the fubverting her domestick Oeconomy, and the hazarding the Affection of his Subjects to their best beloved Prince, by burying them under Misfortunes of every kind, was to be repaid by some Benefit adequate to the risk. But what Benefit, Sir, at least what Benefit of fuch a Nature, can France ever reap and we remain in Safety? Or with what Face can any Man pretend, that the Wifdom and Policy or France appears in such a Conduct, and that the Builoggo opposing it with all her Force, is in Great-Britain either foolish or unjust?

You may possible object, that in all this I take for granted what I ought to have proved, that France is the the natural and irreconcileable Enemy of Britain, that her Prosperity includes our Destruction, and that, though removed from her by our Situation as an Island, we are yet as much bound to oppose her Progress on the Continent, as if we were fettled on the Continent ourselves. But, Sir, this is a Point fo well known, and fo little controverted, that it scarce stands in need But for your fake, Sir, who are a Foreigner, I am content to enter a little upon that stale Topic, as well to convince you that the Fact is certain, as to make you fensible that we have not taken up this Notion as Politicians; but have been forced and driven into it by the Their Conduct, Sir, at all French themselves. Times, and in all Circumstances, have spoke them our determined Enemies, even when we were of the same Religion, when the Families of our Princes were most nearly allied. In War they have endeavoured to oppress us by Dint of Numbers; in Peace they have laboured to deceive and destroy us by specious Pretences of Friendship, which have ever done them most Service, and most hurt us. It would be no difficult Task to support this Observation, by a copious Deduction of Facts for upwards of seven hundred Years past; but to avoid so tedious a Digression let us take a short View of their Behaviour from the beginning of the last Century. The Letters and Negotiations of the French Minifters under the Reign of Henry IV. which have been made publick for the fake of displaying their prodigious Abilities, render it manifest that they would would have hinder'd the Accession of King Fames I. if they had been able; and that they willingly encouraged fuch feditious Spirits as began to stir in the Northern Parts of his Dominions. In the fucceeding Reign they had their Emissaries about the Queen, who was a Daughter of France, who put her upon doing Things that at once debased her Character, and render'd her odious to her Subjects. This forced the King to dismiss all her French Servants at once; an Accident that was improved into giving her a Distaste against one, who was a better Husband than a King, and who gratified her Humours at the Expence of his Interest, and at last of his Life. At the fame time that the French prompted the Court to high and haughty Measures, they were intriguing with the Disaffected, or to use a modern Word, with those in the Opposition. To whom was it that the first Revolters in Scotland addressed themselves, by Petition, for Support against their lawful and hereditary King, but to the Crown of France? and from whence were the first Supplies of Money derived, that enabled the Chiefs of the Party to march an Army into England, but from the French Coffers? What excited the King to that Stiffness, that so much hurt him, but French Councils? And who preferr'd that knavish, trimming Secretary, that took Notes at the Council-Table for the use of the Opposition, I mean Sir Henry Vane, but our French Queen, who was thus the Beginning of those Troubles which fo effectually answered the Ends of her Countrymen? Who was it that for promoting the Scheme just then form'd, and which has been ever fince steadily pursued, truckled to Cromwell, and flatter'd the Usurper, into turning that Power he had H had acquired by the Murder of the King, and the Subversion of the Laws, into doing the dirty Work of France, and depressing the House of Austria to a Degree she has never since recover'd? I need not tell you, Sir, for no Man is ignorant that it was Mazarine, whose Ambition did not soar higher, than his Dissimulation could descend, where Fawning could do the Business better than Force.

Who was it that on the great Turn which flappened here, advised Monk to set up for himfelf, and offer'd to support him with all their Power? Was it not the Crown of France by her Ambassador? And this to keep out a King, who was by Blood a Grandson of France, and who had fuffered himself to be perverted to Popery, by solemn Professions of effectual Assistance. By whom in the Beginning of his Reign, was that Prince feduced into felling Dunkirk to those, who immediately struck a Medal to awaken the Jealoufy of his Subjects upon that Occasion; and afterwards publish'd the whole Negotiation to blacken the Characters of his Ministers? Who was it that first excited the first Dutch War, then join'd with the Dutch against us, and invited Ludlow to Paris, to concert the most effectual Means of restoring the Commonwealth? who was it, that after Force proved abortive, put the King upon arbitrary Measures, betray'd those Measures to such as were likely to put the worst Construction upon them, and by their Ambassadors fung one Song in the Cabinet of the Prince. and another in the Cabals of the Opposition, till the whole Kingdom was in a Flame, and till between true Plots and sham Ones, no Man knew what Title he had to Safety? Who, I fay, did all this, and ten Times more, but France? Who

Who was it that cheated King James out of his Kingdoms, and forced even those who wish'd him best, to concur for their own Safety in such Measures as led him to an Abdication; and who afterwards received that deluded Prince, and pretended to impose him on us as a Tyrant; who if he would have ruled legally might have lived and died our Monarch? who, I fay, but France? And who has ever fince disturbed the prefent Government by Law establish'd, by open Învafions, by fecret Conspiracies, now by avowing the Pretender to the Crown, and then by as fincere Pretences to defert his Interests, in order to recommend fuch Measures as were most likely to ferve him? Who, I fay, but that perpetual Proteus, France?

And now, Sir, let me ask you whether you think, after this hasty, this incorrect, this trifling Sketch of one Instance in a Hundred of her Treachery, any Man can doubt that if Great-Britain has any Sense or Feeling, she must have as honest, as hearty a Detestation for France, as she has Love for lierfelf, and Duty to her Governors. You have heard no doubt that we have Debts, Taxes, and Grievances; but, Sir, to whom do we owe them? Our Debts were incurr'd in two long Wars, to defend ourselves against the Power of France; most of our Taxes came in at the same Door; and all our Corruption began in, and has been consequential from, French Practices. It is a melancholy Truth, but still a Truth it is, that we have been often forced to circumscribe our Liberties, that the Arts of France might not bring about Changes, that might have taken away all Liberty; that we have been obliged to exclude for many Years together, a great Body of People from Places, to which they had as much much a Right as those who possessed them, exclusive of the Suspicion they had brought upon themselves, by an indiscreet, if not a criminal Complaifance for France. That we have been forced first into a long Circle of tedious, troublefome and expensive Negotiations, to fence against French Influence in the Councils at Madrid; and fecondly into a long, uneafy, and ineffectual War to force a Power into a just Notion of her own Interests, which if she would but once understand, would secure ours. Thus you see, Sir, that every Evil we feel, as well as every Evil we have felt, every Mischief that we dread, as well as every Misfortune under which we fuffer, fpring all from the fame Cause, and when traced to their Fountain Head, are justly charged upon We hate her, it is true; but that we do hate her, who can wonder?

That this Deduction of French Injuries and French Perfidies may appear less a Digression, give me leave to return to my Subject, by obferving that they have by Degrees opened the Eyes of the whole Nation; and though we are, as the Inhabitants of all free Countries must be, split into a Multitude of Parties, yet there is not any Party, nay not a fingle Subdivision of any Party, that is not from Experience and Conviction an Enemy to France. The Whigs are professedly fo from Principle; the Tories from repeated Proofs of her Falshood and Dissimulation; nay, the very Jacobites, formerly her staunchest Friends, are now among the bitterest of her Enemies; I mean fuch of them as can think, fuch of them as remember, that to France they owe all their past and present Missortunes, all that they fuffer at Home, the Contempt with which they are treated Abroad, and the Despair they they feel in their own Bosoms. It is therefore a Fact that cannot be questioned, that the general Disposition shewn to succour the Queen of Hungary, and thereby preventing the Execution of the French Plan for extending their Power, was a Measure dictated by the Hearts of all Parties, and not a temporary Start of Romantic Generosity, or of sudden Resentment. No, the Wrongs we have received from France, have been fo various in their Nature, as well as fo many in Number; her Views have been constantly found so diametrically opposite to our Interest, and so directly calculated for subverting our Liberties at Home, and for ruining our Commerce Abroad, both which Designs have been avowed of late Years in Political Treatifes dedicated to their greatest Ministers; that not to be watchful of her Conduct, not to be diffident of her Proceedings, not to be jealous of every Increase of her Power, not to be ready to affift whatever Ally she first attack'd, must be esteemed a Political Lethargy, little short of total Stupefaction.

You may have heard, Sir, but why should I dissemble, you must have heard, Sir, from the Mouths of those who are always fond of proclaiming to Foreigners, what they call the Interests of their own Country, that we are betray'd whenever we meddle with foreign Concerns, that our Situation and our Navy are our natural Securities, and that behind these Barriers we may be fafe not only from the Rage, but from all the Force of the Continent. That to us it is nothing which way the World goes Abroad, if Things go well at Home, that the Ballance of Power is a Cant Word, the Support of the House of Austria a Chimera, the universal Monarchy of France a Goblin; and all these taken together together, a Set of artificial Sounds made use of by Germanized Knaves, to bambouzzle the Fools their Countrymen out of their Money. I am very forry, Sir, to make use of such Language to a Person of your Character; but, Sir, if the Sentiments of these Men be not express'd in their own Language, it is twenty to one but they will disown them; nay, 'tis very great Odds that without a Repetition of the individual Phrases, you might yourself forget that these are the very Doctrines, which in every Coffee-house our Patriot Politicians have of late affected to maintain. You see, Sir, in a narrow Compass, in a few Words, and in their own Words, what it is mifleads Foreigners, and what by the Artifice of evil-meaning, and by the Clamours of noify Men, is imposed upon the World as the Sense of the British Nation.

But, Sir, be not deceived, these Notions are not, never were, or can be the Sense of the Nation. There never was a Parliament that avow'd them, nor can they be avow'd by Parliament, because those who affert them with greatest Violence in their Harangues, disbelieve them in their Hearts. In the Days of King Charles II. and in the Reign of James II. when there was a great Majority of Tories in Parliament, they professed the direct contrary; and then, Sir, they spoke from their Hearts. They frequently advised the first of these Princes to act against France, and more than once they forced him to take that Advice; which was what Sir William Temple, who loved the King and his Family, and never deferted them, told him, would make him the King of bis People. But how King of his People? Not furely by acting contrary to their Interests, against their Sentiments, and with a View to facrifice the Wealth of this Nation for the Service of the House of Austria, or of any other House upon Earth, no Man can be flupid enough to believe this, and what then must be believe? why that the opposing France, and supporting the House of Austria, was the Interest of the British Nation in the Judgment of the British Nation. As for King James they rung this Truth in his Ear, till he would bear it no longer from them. And what follow'd then? Why truly, they would bear no longer with him, but fent him to live. not on the Charity, but on the Policy of that Power, to which he had facrificed the Interests of the People, his own, and those of his Family. For, Sir, as you are a Stranger, give me leave. to tell you, that that the very People, who now, or very lately, preached up this Doctrine, were those who sent King James a grazing (I make use of their own polite Expression) for having acted as if he believ'd it. And now, Sir, having shewn you the Time when they professed the contrary Opinion, I will next shew you now, WHY, and WHEN they changed it.

Wealth

The Tories, Sir, were as deep in the Revolution as the Whigs, and somewhat deeper too, for a certain Tory Earl, who afterwards pretended to be something more than a Tory, advised the Prince of Orange at Windsor to confine, if not to—King James, which Advice his Highness rejected and resented, as became him. But the Tories after the Revolution sinding themselves not rewarded to their Wish, which perhaps was impossible, faced about and opposed the Court. But as this could not be done upon their former Principles, since King William during his whole Reign acted steadily upon those Principles, they were forced to look out for new ones, and then, Sir, they first broached those Doctrines which I have just now mention'd. This was the Rife of the new System, which give me leave to fay, is as abfurd, as unintelligible, and as ridiculous, as from its Origin we might suppose it. For what is to be expected from Men, who in a fit of Passion defert their old Sentiments, and fit down to coin new ones. me leave to add, that their new Practices were of a Piece with their new Principles, and altogether as abfurd, as unintelligible, and as ridi-For these very Men, who formerly professed their Aversion to France, and expelled King James for adhering to France, became themselves the Partizans of France, did her Bufiness during that whole Reign, and by one means or other hinder'd her being brought as low, as for the Security of Europe, and the Safety of ourselves, she ought to have been brought, and would have been brought, by the first Grand Alliance, which they opposed, villify'd, and I might add fomething more, out of Spight, the only Principle they have adher'd to ever fince.

The Tories at the Beginning of the next Reign turn'd about again, or rather return'd to their first Principle, they were hearty for the War, renounced their Intrigues with France, and behav'd once again like Englishmen; but endeavouring to become too arbitrary at Court, and disdaining to do any thing, if they might not do all, they made the Queen so uneasy, that she would no longer bear them, just as they would no longer bear her Father; and thus a new Breach fell out, and then they took up their new Principles again, and swore them to be old ones. During both these Reigns, Holland stood where Hanover does now, now, and for the very fame Reason, because the Mob of all Countries are felfish, and those who would please a Mob must descend to mean Things, and infift upon it they are great Ones. The Alliance they faid was made for the fake of the Dutch; every Measure of the War was taken for the Benefit of the Dutch; the Land and the Trade of this Nation were taxed and ruined for the Dutch; and in short all was sacrificed for the Dutch; while in Truth, the Dutch were facrificing themselves for the common Cause; and, as they are very sensible since, involved their Revenues, and curtailed their Trade, that neither are like to recover in hafte, which is the Reason they have not been so forward fince. Give me leave to ask you, Sir, who are much better acquainted with the Matter than I, whether the Time is not come in which this is the very Case with Hanover? In this War, if any Sacrifice has been made, the Electorate has been facrificed to the Kingdom; and whenever we fee a Peace made, I will venture to prophefy, that whatever becomes of the Kingdom, the Electorate will not get a Penny, nor a Foot of Land by it, though it is very evident to all, who are acquainted with her Circumstances, that she has been sufficiently exhausted in the Quarrel, with which however she had nothing more to do than any other State in Germany; and the only Reason that can be assign'd, either for disliking or deferting her, is, that she has done more than the rest, follow'd her true Interest farther, and kept her Treaties better.

But to purfue my Subject. Be pleafed to obferve, Sir, that during the latter part of the Opposition made by the Tories to the late Ministry, they once more recognized their own Principle, declared against France, and went such Lengths in Favour of the House of Austria, as never any Men went but themselves, when they spirited up the late Emperor's Minister to affront the late King in a Memorial, and to scatter that Memorial among his Subjects. The great Topic of their Complaint then was the fame they had used against Charles and James, that the Councils of these Kingdoms were directed by France, that the House of Austria, our natural Ally, was neglected: that the Dutch were forced against their Will into foolish Treaties, to which they acceded with bad Grace, and abundance more to the same Purpose; of the Truth of which if you enquire of your Bookfeller, and have a large Closer to spare, I dare say he will fill it with authentic Evidence. In those Days, Sir, and those Days, if I may be allow'd the Expression, were but Yesterday, the Support of the House of Austria was no Chimera, the Ballance of Power no Cant Word, the Power of the House of Bourbon a living Giant and no Goblin; neither do I think it impossible that the present Generation may hear them profess the same Things again.

Upon the whole, Sir, as in common Life you do not credit a Man most when he is least in his Senses, or take those for his real Sentiments, which he delivers in the midst of Passion, or in a Fit of the Spleen, so if you will believe these People at all, you must believe what they said a long time ago, before they were out of their Senses, or what they once said in their lucid Intervals, and when there was some Colour for conceiving that they spoke their Minds. But if you are really a Convert, or should think fit to profess yours if so to this Patriot System of the new Stamp, as, if you take your Creed from the Exposition, I am afraid you will, then I must change my Style, and instead of proving to you that People have told you what they do not believe, I must shew you 'tis impossible they should believe it.

This, as it falls out, is no very difficult Task, for you must know, Sir, that all this new System is true in one Sense, and false in another; which those who broach'd it knew very well, and have made all the use of it possible. If, Sir, the Powers on the Continent were equal, without question this System would be right, and Great-Britain ought to take no part in their Quarrels, because she might gain by being Friends with them all, and must lose by falling out with any of them. But this is plainly not the Cafe; and all the Defign of those who are warmest for the Queen of Hungary, and the Ballance of Power is to make this the Cafe. All that they defire, Sir, is to fee Things fo fettled on the Continent, as that Great-Britain may have no Concerns in its Quarrels, that we may have nothing to do, but to mind our Affairs at Home, to secure our Liberties, and extend our Commerce. But this, Sir, is not to be done till France is reduc'd; and those who would perfuade us to the contrary, talk just as reasonably, as if they should exclaim at a Man for losing his Time, exhausting his Spirits, and throwing away his Money, for encouraging Firemen to affift in faving his Neighbour's House, when for twelve Hours he might fafely employ himself in casting up his Books, forting his Goods in his Warehouse, or pursuing the other Duties of his Profession. These are all Duties 'tis true, and no-body will defer d a Man that neglects them, to attend his Neighbour's Concerns with which he has no Bufiness.

But

But if there is a Fire within ten Doors, would he not think you mad if you were to harangue him to this Purpose? and would he not answer you very rationally, Sir, for God's sake let us see the Fire out, for that is my present Business.

When therefore we cooly consider this Matter, it very plainly appears that all that is defireable in the Self-preserving System is pursued by those, who are for prosecuting the present War vigorously, and for reducing France, and the Friends of France, as low as the Justice of their Cause, and the Bleffing of God upon it, by Force of Arms will allow. If this was once done, if the Power of the House of Bourbon was effectually circumfcribed, if a proper Ballance was established in Germany, in Italy, in the North, we need not trouble ourselves with the Affairs of the Continent for a Century to come. We might have time to regulate all our domestick Concerns, and restore every Part of our decaying Constitution to its former Strength, and not leave it in the Power of two or three artful Heads of Factions to new mould at their Pleasure every Administration. We might then attend at Leilure to the necessary Means of depreffing Luxury, and reftoring Industry. fliould foon be able to shake of the Load of Debts and Taxes; to extend our Foreign Commerce, and do every thing that is wished and defired, by fuch as heartily love their Country, and do not make use of that glorious Term to express their Attachment to a Party.

But, Sir, what must be the Case, if we listen to the Advice given us in the Exposition, or if we are deladed into pursuing the Principles laid down therein, let them come from what Hands they will. If we are once cheated into an Opinion that we fet out wrong in this War, or that we have had too great Concern for the Affairs of Germany, there is an End of all our Hopes at Home and Abroad. We shall then do just what we did at the Close of the Queen's Reign, patch up a weak, unconnected, inglorious, unfuftainable, and ruinous Peace, that will entail upon us a long Train of Negotiations, and make the Affairs of the Continent a real Burthen. Sir, is the Truth, and a Truth of fuch Importance to our political Salvation, that upon it, and it alone, it must depend. I know well enough that there are People here, who do not care to have this Truth publish'd in so clear a manner; but he who loves Truth and his Country cannot fear the Refentments of his Countrymen, for speaking the one for the sake of the There are indeed Times in which Truth ought not to be spoken too plainly; but these are so far from being those Times, that on the contrary they are fuch as require Truth to be fet in the clearest Light, because if be not known, and purfued now, it is like to be buried in all Time to come.

To conclude then, for I dare fay, Sir, you are tired, it is the Business of the High Allies to persect what they have begun, to show the Ministry of the great Power in the North, that nothing can contribute so much to the thorough Establishment of the Russian Power, as the Destruction of the French Scheme, and the expelling the Instuence, the pestiserous Instuence, of that designing Court, out of Sweden, Denmark, and Poland; for which there never was so fair an Opportunity as at present. To restore the Freedom, Independency, and Glory of the German Empire, by making the Head of it worthy of being stiled EMPEROR OF THE ROMANS. To maintain that Power in the full Enjoyment of its just Rights, which has been always the Bulwark of Europe against Mohammedan and Christian Tyranny; and to support all the rest of the Princes and States of the Empire, in those Immunities that are derived to them from their Constitution. To secure the Peace and Prosperity of Italy, by obtaining fuch a share of Dominion for the King of Sardinia, as is necessary to prevent his ever being oppressed by France or Spain; I do not fay to procure for him what his personal Virtues and heroic Conduct in the present War deserves, for that might perhaps entitle him to all Italy; and to put it out of the Power of any of the little Princes or States there, to betray their Country in fucceeding Ages, as fome of them have done in this. To oblige the Crown of Spain to perform her Treaties, and to be wife enough to preferve her Indies, by making a right Use of the Wealth she derives from them, and minding the Concerns of that People to whom they belong. To procure for the Maritime Powers whatever they have a Right to ask for the Security of their Foreign Commerce, and the Maintenance of their Liberties at Home. These, Sir, are the Ends, for which we ought to continue the War, let it cost what it will; and the effectually answering these Ends is what the British Nation have a Right to expett from a Peace.

Thus, Sir, in return for your Mafter's Exposition, which was plainly calculated for the People of this Kingdom, I have given you a clear Account, and I dare affirm a true one, of the Principles and Views of all our Parties, of the the true Ground of what you esteem our Prejudice in Favour of the House of Austria, of the just Causes of our Hatred to France, and of our Readiness to take every Occasion to oppose the ambitious Designs of a Neighbour, constantly employed in plotting our Destruction; of the real Interest of this Nation at Home and Ab oad, of the genuine Meaning of Great Bri-.tain's minding its own Concerns, of the Necesfity of profecuting the War with the same View on which it was begun, and the proper Objects of our Attention, whenever Negotiations are in earnest begun, for bringing about a general Peace; and in doing this, Sir, I have spoken with the Freedom becoming a Briton, unbiaffed by the Prejudices of one Party, or the hopes of pleasing another; and, as far as my Abilities will give me leave, acquainting you with the true Sense of the honest Men of all Parties.

How far this, Sir, may be acceptable to you I know not, nor am I much concern'd about it. The Pamphlet you directed to be publish'd very fully justifies this Answer; as well as the Liberty I take of subscribing myself,

SIR,

Your very bumble Servant,

BRITANNUS.
